Go to content icons have been designed to entice girls to learn more about automotive engineering, STEM career intelligence, entrepreneurship and citizenship. The world may look a lot different from kids these days, but that doesn't keep them from dreaming big. Now, Girl Scouts USA (GSUSA) are encouraging its members to participate and hone their leadership skills in new, often male fields. The organization announced today that they are debuting 24 new badges related to activities around STEM career intelligence and citizenship, among other areas. In a press release, GSUSA shared that the new icons include: Entrepreneurship (for K-12 classes). In this part of the program, funded by Susan Bulkeley Butler and developed in collaboration with VentureLab, Girl Scouts participate in exercises that help them create and create a product or service that solves the problem. They build their own business plan and think about topics such as production, cost, profit, marketing and competition. STEM Career Research (classes 2-8). Funded by IF/THEN, an initiative by Lyda Hill Charity, this programming encourages girls to explore their career interests and connect them to STEM fields, particularly computer science, nature/environmental science, technology, design, health and agriculture, which can help them solve the pressing challenges of our time and change the world. Automotive (K-5 classes). This programming, funded by General Motors, includes the design, design and production of vehicles, as well as the future of mobility. Girl Scouts design their own cars, test prototypes, learn about design thinking, create their own process of production of assembly lines and more. Citizens (K-12 classes). In order to become voters, activists and even heads of states, girls will learn how government, research laws and how they are created, and get specifics on the ballot, and the Electoral College, women's representation in government, and more in this curriculum funded by the Citi Foundation. They also study their government officials and are encouraged to meet with them. GSUSA also shares unnerving statistics like the fact that only 13 percent of engineers are women and three out of four of today's girls are interested in becoming an entrepreneur, but more than half also say they need more support in this area. But with hope, their new and existing programs will offer Girl Scouts a chance to turn the tide. In a press release, GSUSA CEO Sylvia Acevedo noted the news, noting: It is now more important than ever that we have strong leaders who can make informed decisions that make the world a better, safer, fairer place. During the current health crisis, the world's who were among the most determined and effective in the fight against the pandemic were women. With these new icons in STEM, enterprise and critical citizenship theme, Girl Scouts continues to continue women leaders of today and the future and show girls the power they need to truly change the world. In addition, the organization also provides girls with the opportunity to study and learn during this particularly difficult summer. All councils have the opportunity to hold their own Girl Scout Cyber Challenge sponsored by Raytheon Technologies, allowing middle and high school girls to learn critical cybersecurity skills. And they offer new and existing programs digitally through Girl Scouts at Home. © copyright. All rights are reserved. But in truth, some icons that are needed for Eagle Scouts are significantly more fun to earn than others. Some can also be earned within a few days, while others take three months at a minimum. And some of them are best done in the Boy Scout camp rather than at home. Here are insider tips on how to get these Eagle necessary badges done in a timely manner without making the process too overwhelming for Eagle Hope or his or her parents. Earning merit badges takes time and effort. Scout can best navigate the process when he or she is making a plan and minds important guidelines. Some common strategies to keep in mind. While citizenship, life skills, and wildlife survival make up the knowledge base every eagle should have, some of Eagle's essential merit badges are pretty dry affairs. Important, yes, but not necessarily exciting. Encourage your scout to do two or three a year rather than all 12 at once, and achieve as much as possible in the Scout camp. As for any badge of merit, make sure your scout signs with merit adviser badge and receives his or her blue card - the documents required for each merit sign-launched before any work requirement begins. Most troops will not give retroactive credit for merit badge work. Some troops hold badge-about-frames or other daytime troop activities where scouts can work on promotion projects and get one or two Eagle badges started. This is especially useful for badges that don't really fit the 7-day Scout Camp format, such as personal management, family life, and some citizenship badges. These tips will help you and your potential Eagle Scout choose which icons to go for, as well as when and where. Camp or Badge-O-rama Emergency Readiness Environmental Science Swimming First Aid Communication Citizenship in the Citizenship Community in the Country work on individual lifesaving Cycling Citizenship in the World of Personal Fitness Personal Family Life Management Only one of these badges does not But many teens find the material so fascinating and exciting they end up completing both. Emergency preparedness is a great badge to complete in a Boy Scout camp. If your child is a lifeguard, he may find Lifesaving to be a non-headache option. Either Or it's one of those badges that kids and parents love. Most people think it's best to end it in a scouting camp. The material is much more interesting in the desert, and environmental observation exercises can be tedious if only wild animals at home are made up of ants and mosquitoes. If your child is a member of a swimming team or goes to scouting camp, swimming is the easiest and easiest choice. A tourist icon is a good option for non-swimming, nature-loving kids who enjoy serious, long-distance hikes. Don't even consider a cycling badge if your child is not a die-hard cyclist whose idea of fun rides 20 to 30 miles every weekend. His lessons are so important to everything in Scouting, chances are that most of the requirements will be completed over the years just as a for a reason, of course. Like every Scout Merit badge, it is important that your child gets signed up with a merit badge advisor before starting any job requirement, or he won't count. This icon is one of the most interesting, action-packed icons for teens. To earn it, the scout must master all aspects of the basic trauma care, from the scratches and bruising of urban life to the potentially life-threatening wounds, breaks and wounds that can occur in the outback. But while it may be interesting, it's not good for solo work. It is best done in a Scout camp or as an organized troop activity. While the material involved in these three local, federal and global citizenship badges is valuable, trying to make all three at once is a recipe for catastrophic levels of boredom. The best option is to get community and/or nation badges started during a troop event or scout camp and finish the job yourself. The Citizenship in the World badge can be made entirely on its own, with the guidance of a badge consultant. Most of the work of this icon can be done individually with the badge EA's manual, but one component - speech - requires an audience, making it a good option for a badge-o-rama event. All three of these personal icons are simple, important learning experiences that can be done entirely alone. Teenagers who participate in high school athletics in particular will find personal wind fitness. Where it gets complicated, that each icon requires three months of activity and accounting to keep track of all that exercise, budgeting, and/or household chores. Teenagers usually don't have a pun with tasks - it's the tracking that gets them, and the inability to stay on top of the account means you have to start over. For example, creating a good tracking system, the Excel spreadsheet, is critical. Once in accounting mode, your teen may find it easier to make all three icons at once.
